IN THE GROVE.

It was a cloudy afternoon in July. The morning had been prophetic of a pleasant day; but, like a great many prophecies of the present time, had proved utterly false. Yet a Sunday school—it was a Presbyterian in its belief, and so did not cater to a sprinkling—had determined to shut its eyes to the threatening look of the sky, and gone on a picnic thirty miles from home. But the heavy drops of rain, which fell about the middle of the day, drove them from their original place of destination, the famous Lion Creek Bridge gorge, and sent them on some five miles more to the pleasant town of Horwich.

The excellent music discoursed by the band which accompanied the excursionists, as well as the inherent curiosity of man to know strangers, attracted many of the residents of Horwich "down in the grove," where the picknickers were. Jack Haviland was one of the many who could not resist the temptation—Jack and his friend Marion. Down they went to the grove, with one umbrella between them.

Just as one had hope to describe the feelings of a lone young man who was wandering through a bevy of young girls, any one and every one of whom he desired to know, yet none of whom he could know, Jack was overpowered with that inexplicable feeling. And who can blame him, when he would expect him to feel other than that? He had been shut up for six long months, poring over "Parsons on Contracts"—a book so suggestive of love dreams—"Ken's Commentaries," a "Law Glossary," and "Tomlin's Law Dictionary."

Just then two young ladies came into the field of his vision. One Jack knew, the other was a stranger, and the other was the one Jack immediately began to admire. She was of medium height, dressed simply, yet tastefully, in a white Garibaldi waist—believe Jack found out afterward that was the name of it—believed in by a broad ribbon, a dark skirt, and a white apron, and she was, as Jack said, "just the way to the will-o'-the-wisp, a sprite, or some other fearful deception, for what possibility was there of his ever getting acquainted with her suddenly and so vainly, much less of—well, Jack had no idea yet exactly defined it in his own mind.

Just then it began to rain. Jack had his friend's umbrella. It would not do to let her get wet, so without a word Jack opened the umbrella, stalked over to where she stood, and held it over her. She did not take offense. She looked up into his face and smiled. Jack smiled back at her, and she smiled back at him. "It's too bad this rain," said she, with the accent on the "too bad," just as girls always speak.

"I don't know," blundered Jack, in reply. She looked at him curiously, and said, "Well," in a self-interrogatory way, as though she might have said, "What sort of an oddity are you?" and then laughed again.

With that Jack also laughed, and came to himself. Then he began to talk, and they got on grandly.

The rain not ceasing, Jack walked home with her, for he found out that she lived in town. When they had arrived at her door, and she had thanked him for the use of the umbrella, or rather the use of himself and the umbrella, Jack knew he ought to go; but—every young man knows how it is—he was not quite ready.

"And mine is Clio Stanley," said she, with the accent on the "too bad," just as girls always speak.

"And—and I'm studying law here in town."

"And I am stopping here for the summer with papa. I should be happy to receive a call from you."

Then Jack went home. The next day Jack thought it all over. The one moment he called himself a fool, the next he chuckled over the action, and decided, with all the solemnity of a court, to try to get toward which position he had aspirations, that was rather "cute," and it cut, why he, as the perpetrator, must be somewhat sharp. Now he was inclined to feel sorry and ashamed over it; then, with an appeal to the principal heathen deity in his vocabulary, Jack expressed himself as "deuced glad" it happened.

So he went on in spirit alternating up and down, like a boy on a see-saw, provided the boy could ride both ends of the see-saw at once, which, I suppose, is an impossibility; but when evening came, he went and called on the young lady. She invited him to call again. Jack did so. In fact, he went several consecutive times.

Three days passed away. Jack had studied diligently, and now for six months had been practicing law, with every prospect of success. All this time his devoted attention had been paid to Clio; yet in all that time not a word of love had passed between them. Jack could not and would not ask her to love him until he could offer her something more than his own person. He had been waiting, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain. He had waited in vain, and he had waited in vain.

With that Clio smiled, and Jack's momentary displeasure vanished, yet there was left on his mind the unexplained impression that, after all, he had been sold. But the ice of reserve was broken.

"To be plain, Clio, I came down to tell you that I love you."

Here came a long pause. Jack looked at everything in the room except Clio. It was getting exceedingly embarrassing to Jack, when there came a quiet "Well?" from Clio.

"And to say," went on Jack, as though no interruption had occurred, "that I am in a condition to get married."

"What a very desirable situation for any young man, I am sure," said Clio; and then she laughed that same low, rippling laugh he loved so. Poor fellow! why couldn't he have interpreted the love for him which rounded and mellowed that laugh? But no, he grew desperate, and, with the thought that she was sporting with him, just a little angry.

"I have known how it would end. Any fellow is a fool to dangle round any girl for three years." And he strode toward the door. His hand was upon it. "I might have known you wouldn't have married me."

"But Jack!" he turned—"you haven't asked me to."

"Haven't asked you to?" Jack caught the look in her eyes. The next moment she was in his arms, and her arms were round his neck, and the fact is, Jack never did ask the question.

After the first happy moments had passed, and the ecstasies of the acknowledged mutual love had effervesced—acknowledged as such by Jack—well as by any one else, Jack began to feel that he had been shut up for six long months, poring over "Parsons on Contracts"—a book so suggestive of love dreams—"Ken's Commentaries," a "Law Glossary," and "Tomlin's Law Dictionary."

Just then two young ladies came into the field of his vision. One Jack knew, the other was a stranger, and the other was the one Jack immediately began to admire.
